In old times there was a material point in questions of this sert. Civil and ecclesiastical authority were mixed up in the minds of all men, and ambitious, and a ruggled for power, and no definite limits were fixed to the authority of either. It was a contest of despots, the mass of the people taking sides with one or the other. Henry VIII. became disgusted with his lawful wife, and sought a diverce. The l'ope, by common consent, had a word to say on the subject, and refused his assent, Ac arding to our notion, he had no business with the question: but we, of this day, are not judges. The millions of that day thought otherwise. Henry himself thought otherwise. Indeed, it was in ral crime in the mouarch to put away his wife, and as Henry was a son of the Church, he was responsible to it for this sin.
